Concerning Jackson, Lieutenant McKim says: "I need not speak of the great place this modest and reticent soldier, Thomas J. Jackson, made for himself among the great captains of history."

Distinguished military critics like Lieutenant-Colonel G. F. R. Henderson, whose two volumes on the life and career of Stonewall Jackson are the most complete and accurate that have appeared, have said all that need be, and said it with authority.

Between campaigns, while in attendance upon General George H. Stuart, who was wounded and in the hospital, Lieutenant McKim had a chance to visit with Miss Agnes Gray Phillips, daughter of Rev. R. H. Phillips, of Staunton, who became Lieutenant McKim's wife on February 26, 1863.

During the winter of 1862-63 (that Lieutenant McKim decided to become a candidate for orders in the Episcopal Church. He had not reported for duty at the battle of Chancellorsville, but writes an excellent account of it.

His gallant cousin, Major William Duncan McKim, who was killed during an assault on Hooker's intrenchments at this battle was a source of great grief to Lieutenant McKim.

Winters embody what the author has to say about the beginning of the Gettysburg campaign, the march to Gettysburg and the part played in the battle by General Stuart's brigade, which lost out of 2,000 men, 1,000 killed, wounded and missing.

In the autumn of 1863 Lieutenant McKim resigned from the Confederate Army to prepare for ordination to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, with intention to return to the service in the capacity of chaplain. He was ordered deacon by Bishop Johns, of Virginia, May 11, 1864, and licensed to perform the service and deliver addresses and exhortations in accordance with the canons of the Episcopal Church of the Confederate States, February 10, 1864.

He was commissioned and installed as chaplain of Colonel Thomas T. Munford's regiment, the Second Virginia Cavalry, September 1, 1864.

With his regiment, Chaplain McKim went through the vicissitudes of Early's Valley campaign in 1864, a hard campaign, marked by almost daily fighting and frequent fights. An accident on the night of September 18, 1864, followed by the capture of the regiment, resulted in the loss of his right arm.

really. It is only recently that the present Mrs. Henley has heard of the death of her first husband, Dick Wrinkle, who has long been lost to view as a wanderer in the wide world. She therefore feels as if recently bereaved, and insists upon having a monument set up in the village cemetery and a funeral sermon preached.

Alfred is thus placed in the position of being asked to attend the belated obsequies of his predecessor.

But while Alfred is the victim of an ironic fortune, he calls for sympathy in quite another relation. Next door to him lives Dixie Hart, an attractive young girl, who does a man's work in trying to support herself and her widowed mother. She is pathetically anxious to marry and be rid of her burdens, even going to the length of corresponding with a man she has never seen.

Alfred, who understands all this, acts as her friend, eventually rescuing her from the clutches of the villain skink, who owns the land upon which she lives. Un
